As populations decline, some people choose to stay in their hometowns, while others move to larger cities for better opportunities. There are other options as well. Nowadays, some individuals decide to live with extended family members.

What are the reasons for this? Some people find it beneficial to have family members around for support and assistance. Others enjoy the sense of community and shared responsibilities that come with living in a multigenerational household. Because of this, they experience greater social connection and emotional well-being.

On the other hand, some individuals encounter challenges with multigenerational living arrangements. They may struggle with privacy issues or conflicts arising from different lifestyles and preferences. Additionally, some worry about the financial burden of supporting multiple generations under one roof. As a result, they may face stress and tension within the household.
