When people plan a vacation, some prefer to travel alone, and others like to join a group tour. There are other choices, too. These days, many choose to go on group tours.

What are the reasons for this? Some enjoy group tours because they can make new friends who share similar interests. Other people prefer group tours as they offer a chance to visit many places without worrying about planning. Because of this, they find group tours convenient and fun.

However, some find group tours to be too crowded and less flexible. This can be frustrating for those who enjoy solitude or want to explore at their own pace. Some also feel that group tours can rush from one place to another. As a result, they believe that while group tours offer convenience, they may also miss out on a deeper connection with the places they visit.
